The first of these is the fact that the world is not a uniform whole, but a collection of many different parts, each with its own characteristics and interests. This is the case with the human world, where different nations and peoples have different customs, languages, and ways of life. It is also the case with the natural world, where different regions have different climates, plants, and animals. This diversity is a source of richness and interest, but it also creates challenges for those who seek to understand and govern the world as a whole.

The second of these is the fact that the world is not a static whole, but a constantly changing one. The forces of nature are always at work, shaping and reshaping the world around us. The human world is also constantly changing, as new ideas, technologies, and social structures emerge. This change is a source of progress and improvement, but it also creates uncertainty and instability.

The third of these is the fact that the world is not a simple whole, but a complex one. The relationships between the different parts of the world are often intricate and difficult to understand. The human world is particularly complex, with many different interests and powers at play. This complexity makes it difficult to see the world as a single, unified entity.

These three facts—the diversity of the world, the constant change of the world, and the complexity of the world—create a sense of mystery and wonder. They also create a sense of responsibility. We are all part of the world, and we all have a role to play in shaping its future. It is our duty to understand the world as it is, and to work to make it a better place for all of us.
