the information science community, and the information science community has been largely unresponsive to the needs of the library community.

There are a number of reasons why the information science community has been largely unresponsive to the needs of the library community. One reason is that the information science community has been largely self-referential, and has not been open to the needs of other communities. Another reason is that the information science community has been largely focused on the technical aspects of information science, and has not been concerned with the social aspects of information science.

There are a number of ways in which the information science community can become more responsive to the needs of the library community. One way is to become more open to the needs of other communities. Another way is to become more concerned with the social aspects of information science.
